Copyright and research

Selecting a licence for your work

Overview

Creative Commons (CC) licences allow authors to nominate how they would like people to be able to use and reuse their work. Applying a CC licence to your work signals to others how you, the copyright owner, would like to be attributed if your work is reused. If you are publishing Open Access, the publisher will likely release your work under one of these licences.

More information can be found at Creative Commons Australia.

This page provides information on common CC licences used in academia. There are other open licences beyond Creative Commons that may be more appropriate for your work, such as open source licences (for software) or traditional knowledge labels (for works containing Indigenous knowledge).

Creative Commons licences

The below table provides information on what each licence means for the author and/or copyright holder, and a generic sample text that can be included in a publication.

If you are applying the licence information to your own work, we suggest including the sample text below at the beginning of the work so that the rights being licenced are immediately clear to all. It is also useful to include a licence statement in the information on the landing page where your output is hosted if this is possible.

To find out which licence you would like to allocate to a work visit the Creative Commons licence chooser.

Creative Commons Attribution (CC BY) 	This licence allows others to distribute, remix, adapt, and build upon your work, even commercially, as long as they credit you for the original creation. This is the most accommodating of licences offered. The images or other third-party material in this [insert item type] are included under the Creative Commons licence, unless indicated otherwise in a credit line to the material.
